mined manner, flicking their tongues at a regular rate and keeping the front of their body extended. Boas likely to bite usually provide ample warning for those able to interpret their behaviors. Nervous adult imported boas hiss, raise their heads above the ground, and form a coil in the front part of their body that usually precedes a strike. A frightened boa, when handled, also coils, sometimes hisses lightly, and performs slow tongue flicks, leaving its tongue extended for relatively prolonged periods of time. When handling animals that perform these potential pre-strike behaviors, use caution and avoid sudden movements. Instead, gently encourage the snake to move forward, or place the snake back in its enclosure until it settles down. During educational presentations, it is important to properly read a snake's behavior to prevent accidents. Small, excited children frequently make sudden movements that may alarm a snake. Under these circumstances, the snake may be uncertain whether it faces a potential enemy or an unthreatening human. Anybody using animals for educational purposes must pay close attention to their behaviors. Some snakes are perfect candidates for these types of demonstrations, while others may be too nervous to be reliable.
