

ORGANIC CHEMISTRY

1. INTRODUCTION

A SLIGHT alteration has been made in the arrangement of this year's Report by the introduction of sections on "Physical Properties and Organic Structure" and "Reaction Mechanisms" in place of the customary "Theoretical" section. The change reflects the increasing use and greater power of physical methods in structure determination. As a result, this Report contains no collected account of the quantitative study of organic equilibria or of theoretical investigations of molecular structure and properties. It is hoped to rectify these omissions on a future occasion.

In recent years the study of stereochemistry has become more and more integrated with other aspects of structural investigation and all sections of this Report contain material of stereochemical interest. A separate section under this heading has therefore been discontinued, a policy which will be subject to review in future years.

It was intended to include a separate section on steroids this year. Owing to illness of a Reporter, this has not been possible. At short notice, Dr. Overton, with the help of Dr. C. J. W. Brookes, Dr. J. Elks, and Professor W. Klyne, has included in the "Alicyclic" section a brief summary of some of the more important steroid papers published during 1962.

The section on "Reaction Mechanisms" is planned as a representative account of current work and illustrates the extent to which mechanistic studies of organic reactions are being pursued. Lack of space has prevented the inclusion, this year, of detailed reports on several important topics, of which the stereochemistry of substitution at phosphorus and silicon atoms are especially noteworthy and regrettable omissions. Important studies on simple heterolytic reactions have concerned olefin-forming eliminations and the clear demonstration of the formation of a tetrahedral intermediate in an electrophilic aromatic substitution. There has been extensive work on intramolecular catalysis of hydrolytic reactions as models for enzyme catalysis. The almost simultaneous appearance of several textbooks¹ on enzyme mechanisms within the general context of organic reaction mechanisms underlines the importance of this approach.

Theoretical problems of general interest have been provided by a challenging attack on the basis for "non-classical" carbonium ions and by a proposed re-definition of the concept of aromaticity. Ideas on the latter subject and consequently on the status of the Hückel rule have been stimulated by experimental work on large conjugated rings (annulenes), in particular on their nuclear magnetic resonance spectra. Important developments in several fields are to be expected from studies of the chemistry of diazirine, the cyclic isomer of diazomethane.
