AVENUES OF APPROACH TO THE EXPLORATION OF MARS

For convenience, we distinguish four categories of work that can contribute to attaining our goals: (a) laboratory work needed to develop techniques for planetary investigations and the knowledge needed to interpret their findings; (b) Earth-bound astronomical studies of Mars; (c) the use of spacecraft for the remote investigation of Mars; and (d) a direct study of the Martian surface by landing missions.

LABORATORY WORK

The consideration of the evolution of life on Mars raises many problems that can be studied in Earth-based laboratories. Such studies are, in fact, essential to provide the background against which the results of planetary missions must be interpreted. The work includes the chemical analysis of meteorites, especially with respect to their content of organic compounds, and the extension of studies on the spontaneous formation of organic molecules and their aggregation into larger units. These investigations may reveal to us not only the mechanism by which the materials essential for living organisms were first formed, but also the origin of reactions and mechanisms that lead to the formation of organized structures and their self-perpetuation. Other possibly interesting lines of effort include study of alternatives to the carbon-water system of biochemistry and simulations of Martian and other planetary environments. While some of these simulated environments may allow terrestrial microorganisms or enzyme systems to function, others may be more conducive to the activity of reaction systems based on alternative biochemistries.

It will become clear later that considerable work remains to be done in defining schemes for life detection and in developing the instrumentation to exploit them.

EARTH-BOUND ASTRONOMICAL STUDIES OF MARS

The observation of Mars from terrestrial observatories enjoys the advantages of economy, absence of weight and size limitations, and high data rate. It is, however, limited by the terrestrial atmosphere in attainable
