

denarii above mentioned, whose maker perhaps imitated the fashion of the invaders. In Syria there were produced, during the first half of the second century,¹⁹ serrated coins of bronze.²⁰ But probably the earliest examples of the fashion come from Macedonia, where it appears during the reign of Philip V (210-179 a.c.).

The object of the practice is quite unexplained. The non-Roman peoples who used it soon became tired of it. Why did the Romans take it up vigorously about half a century after it had been dropped by other peoples? It cannot have been intended to emphasise the purity of the metal, since it was used for bronze coins by the Greeks, and for plated coins by the Romans. Probably, however, the reason why the German barbarians liked them was that they could see at once whether a denarius was of solid silver or not.

G. F. HILL.

¹⁹ About 190 to 140 a.c., according to Babalon, France, i, 620.

²⁰ According to Babalon they, unlike the Romanes, were cast in waste form before striking. That may be true of the majority of them, for the serrations certainly look blunter than those on the other series described above, and are sometimes nearly blocked by a ridge running round the edge of the coin. But the indentations on the original metal must have been made by cutting, as elsewhere. Kuhn (Praktische Numismatik, 1900-11, pp. 211 ff.) maintains that the Carthaginian sestertii were also cast in that form before striking. He appears to be judging from a single specimen. It is not true of the three specimens in the British Museum.
