

The Hardest Hero

BY THEODORE K. BIRCH

Children go into kindergarten with very few friends. In the absence of their old playgroup, teachers in K-12 classes struggle to help the well-known "lone ranger" make sense of a new life. The following essay illustrates what it can be like, and it is from a personal school teacher's viewpoint.

I remember the first time I saw a child who was alone in a classroom. It was a boy named John, who was about 5 years old. He was sitting at his desk, looking at the teacher with a sad expression. The teacher asked him if he had any friends, and he said no.

The teacher then asked him if he had any friends at home, and he said yes. The teacher then asked him if he had any friends at school, and he said no. The teacher then asked him if he had any friends in the neighborhood, and he said no. The teacher then asked him if he had any friends in the whole world, and he said no.

The teacher then asked him if he had any friends in the whole world, and he said no. The teacher then asked him if he had any friends in the whole world, and he said no. The teacher then asked him if he had any friends in the whole world, and he said no.
