

THE BORN - EINSTEIN LETTERS

THE BORN - EINSTEIN LETTERS

The correspondence between
MAX & HEDWIG BORN and
ALBERT EINSTEIN
1916-1955

Commentaries MAX BORN
Translation IRENE BORN
Introduction WERNER HEISENBERG
Foreword BERTRAND RUSSELL

...the world, and in complete law and order in a world which is, in a strictly speculative way, an utterly contrived attitude to science which were never reconciled throughout the long series of letters. Born, in holding that the basis of the material world was the purely random behaviour of the constituent particles of atoms, shared the majority viewpoint among quantum scientists, yet Einstein persisted in thinking that every event must have its cause, and searched constantly for a deeper explanation which might bring order into the seemingly chaotic subatomic world. Their conflicting views provide the intellectual stimulus of much of this correspondence.

But at a time when politicians were railing the terrifying power of atomic physics to provide weapons of unimagined destructiveness neither Born nor Einstein could turn their backs on the social implications of the new science. At first their letters share a tone of concern; in the end, when the atomic bomb has been used and the innocence of science has been left far behind, they can only regret 'the evil which our once-so-beautiful science has brought upon the world'. The under effects of war dominate many of the letters, for both Born and Einstein were forced to flee from Germany during the Hitler regime, and the scars of the experience lasted as long with Einstein that he never felt able to return.

In spite of their scientific differences Born and Einstein sustained a rare and close friendship for more than forty years, and Einstein's death in 1955 (Max Born was to live until 1970). For long periods these letters were the only link between them. Whether they are commiserating over the plight of German Jews in exile, or delighting in the plays and poems of Born's wife Hedwig, or exchanging sharp and often witty comments about their scientific colleagues, the two men reveal throughout the essential warmth and generosity of their personalities. As Bertrand Russell writes in his foreword: 'In an age of mediocrity and moral paganism, their lives shine with an unusual beauty. Something of this is reflected in their correspondence, and the world is richer for its publication'.
