

Expansion and Reform (1990-1999):

During the 1980s, given that, after several unsuccessful, non-unionised pay campaigns, the public sector's generalists' associations (including the national teachers' association) still refused to take measures to encourage their staff to work longer hours, while the public sector's management wanted to encourage staff to work longer hours, the government decided to encourage the generalists' associations to provide incentives, instead of the government itself. After 1989, the government, the generalists' associations, and the public sector's management agreed to work together to encourage staff to work longer hours.
