

Deeply Contingent A Priori Knowledge

JOHN HAWTHORNE
Rutgers University

Introduction

0.1 In 'Reference and Contingency,'¹ Gareth Evans distinguished between 'superficially contingent' and 'deeply contingent' truths. A true sentence is superficially contingent just in case the function from possible worlds to truth-values associated with that sentence reckons it false at some (non-actual) world. A deeply contingent true sentence is one for which there is no semantic guarantee that there actually exists some verifying state of affairs.² Supposing I introduce 'Julius' by the reference fixer 'the inventor of the zip', then the sentence 'If anyone uniquely invented the zip, Julius invented the zip' is merely superficially contingent. Though false at some worlds, anyone who understands it will see that it is true at the actual world just in case 'If anyone uniquely invented the zip, then the unique inventor of the zip invented the zip' is true. Since it is quite clear that the latter can be known without empirical investigation,³ the same is true of the former. We have little trouble seeing how there can be superficially contingent a priori knowledge: once we get straight about what is involved in understanding (merely) superficially contingent sentences—which is part of the more general project of accounting for our understanding of indexical elements of language, there is no genuine

¹ In Collected Papers, Oxford University Press, 1985, 178–213.

² The term 'semantic guarantee that there actually exists some verifying state of affairs' means roughly 'if one understood it one would thereby be in a position to recognize that there actually exists some verifying state of affairs.' There are tricky penumbral cases: Is 'I exist' superficially contingent? Your answer will depend on whether you think you know it to be true by introspection or whether you think understanding the proposition automatically enables you to know it to be true. It should also be conceded that to the extent to which the very notion of possession conditions is ill-defined or context-dependent, one ought to be suspicious of the distinctions that are in play here.

³ Someone may complain that pretty much any bit of knowledge about whether a sentence is true will be ultimately empirical and that the whole discussion should be conducted at the level of propositions/modes of presentation/senses/guises.... I shall ignore such issues of fine-tuning here.
