

Understanding Independence and Autonomy in a Therapeutic Setting

By Ojasvi Kaul

Addressing a growing concern of intermixing words with similar meanings especially in the setting of mental health, we have started to use the words independence and autonomy in a way that has left so many of us in confusion. Sure, on the surface they sound the same - making decisions on our own - but when you look closely, the meaning is different and they are used in different contexts.

Independence can be understood as the absence of external control, influence, or support. It implies the ability to make decisions and take actions without being unduly influenced or constrained by others. The connotation is often associated with overcoming challenges and asserting one's identity.

Autonomy on the other hand, talks about the ability to self-direct within an established framework. Here, the perspective changes and we take the internal force as the guiding power behind our decision-making. The connotation is often associated with empowerment, control, and the ability to make meaningful choices.

This difference may not seem huge, but in psychology, the implication is big. Let us make this simple with the help of a few examples, especially in a therapeutic setting.

Independence is seen when therapists work with clients to develop self-reliance, confidence, and a sense of personal agency.

- Developing personal coping skills - Radhika worked on her stress and anxiety, by handling challenging situations by using mindfulness and relaxation techniques.
- Building emotional resilience - Geeta was struggling with low self-esteem and with therapy started to recognize and challenge the negative self-talk, which helped her have a more positive self-image.
- Overcoming dependency on approval - Nitesh wishes to work on his need for external validation by challenging his beliefs and thought patterns and building internal sources of validation.
