

Congress Report

The ACC meeting in Atlanta, 13 - 17 March 1994

L. DISLER

The ACC meeting in Atlanta (13 - 17 March 1994) was an interesting and, as usual, extremely well-organised congress. A wide range of subjects was presented, and one had to be especially careful in planning one's selection of lectures. A few of the sessions were disappointing, but overall the standard of presentations was excellent, and they were followed by useful discussions.

Hypertrophic cardiomyopathy

Kenneth Baughman, Baltimore, USA, and John Goodwin, UK discussed the concept of chronotropic incompetence (CI) in HCM. This was defined as failure to achieve 80% of maximum heart rate. A group of 131 patients was evaluated, 37% of whom had CI. This group had a low $\dot{V}O_{2max}$, suggesting impaired exercise capacity. Patients with HCM had improved exercise capacity with dual-chamber pacing and additional benefits were seen with rate-responsive dual chamber (DDD) pacing in patients who had CI.

The mechanism of benefit obtained with dual-chamber pacing was discussed. Pacing induces paradoxical septal motion and this results in decreased SAM with abolition of the gradient. Interestingly, after a few months, when pacing was temporarily discontinued, a number of patients continued to have no gradient while in sinus rhythm. The ECG showed surprising changes with a decrease in the degree of L-VII. Patients with HCM without rest gradients, but who had provokable gradients, may have been severely symptomatic and refractory to drug treatment.

Ten such patients were studied, all of whom had gradients provokable with valsalva or isoprenaline. At follow-up of 11 ± 5 months, there was a significant improvement in symptoms from NYHA 3.1 (± 0.3) to NYHA 1.4 (± 0.5). There was also a marked improvement in angina, dizziness and syncope episodes. There was a significant decrease in the provokable gradient from 140 mmHg to 56 mmHg. It was concluded that DDD pacing should be considered in this group. Faganpazir said that regression of LV hypertrophy was noted in a number of patients after DDD pacing.

Certain patients with HCM may require an ICD. A study looked at the safety of implanting the device and the conclusion was that an ICD can be effectively implanted in high-risk patients.

The effect of pacing on diastolic function in HCM was discussed. This was an acute study and the findings were that although pacing abolished the gradient, there was an increase in septal and apical stiffness which could produce impairment of early diastolic filling. However, the long-term effects of pacing may be completely different, and diastolic function may in fact improve.

Sudden cardiac death

Douglas Zipes, Indianapolis, said that post-MI denervation hypersensitivity may be an important mechanism of SD. This could be detected with a meta iodo benzyl guanidine (MIBG) scan. He also stressed the importance of the pericardium, which is not simply an envelope, but an active tissue which synthesises prostaglandins and other substances which may have important anti-arrhythmic effects. (It may be important post-cardiothoracic surgery
