

What is Anthropology?

Anthropology is the study of human beings and their cultures, from prehistoric times to today. The people who practice anthropology are called anthropologists.

Anthropologists often compare different human communities. They try to determine their similarities and differences. By doing this, anthropologists hope to increase their knowledge about humanity as a whole, as well as about specific groups of people.

Anthropology has two main divisions: physical and cultural.

Physical anthropologists study the biological science that deals with the adaptations, variability, and evolution of human beings and their living and fossil relatives. Because it studies human biology in the context of human culture and behaviour, physical anthropology is also a social science. The AAPA is the world's leading professional organization for physical anthropologists. Formed by 83 charter members in 1930, the AAPA now has an international membership of over 2,200. The Association's annual meetings draw more than two thousand scientists and students from all over the world.

Cultural anthropologists specialize in the study of culture and peoples' beliefs, practices, and the cognitive and social organization of human groups. Cultural anthropologists study how people who share a common cultural system organize and shape the physical and social world around them, and are in turn shaped by those ideas, behaviours, and physical environments.
