Agricultural performance in Tanzania under structural adjustment programs: Is it really so positive?

Abstract. The performances in the food and cash crop sectors and the availability and consumption of agricultural inputs in Tanzania during structural adjustment programs (1986–1996) are compared with periods prior to this IMF/World Bank backed reform. The positive developments in the first five years of reform appear to be not sustainable. Presently productivity levels per rural capita for important food and cash crops are declining. There are no further improvements in the availability and consumption of agricultural inputs. The removal of subsidies on agricultural inputs from 1991 onwards is crucial in explaining the decline in maize production, the main food crop in Tanzania. Some assumptions behind the reform measures are proving to be wrong. Modifications are thus needed to improve the agricultural sector of Tanzania in a sustainable way. Structural adjustment programs usually go too far in reducing the role of the government. However, government involvement might be necessary to ensure a higher consumption of agricultural inputs and thus a better performance of the agricultural sector in Tanzania. A higher productivity in the agricultural sector is needed in Tanzania to avoid food security problems in the future.

Key words: Agricultural performance, Fertilizer consumption, Food security, Structural adjustment, Tanzania, World Bank/IMF policies

Bert Meertens is a PhD graduate from Wageningen University and Research Centre, Department of Communication and Innovation Studies and Department of Plant Science. From 1989 to 1992 he was a member of the Tanzania-Netherlands Farming Systems Research Project Lake Zone and during 1994–1996 he was employed by the Kilimo/FAO Plant Nutrition Programme in Tanzania. At present he is involved in a project of the International Fertilizer Development Centre-Africa (IFDC-A) on farmer participatory soil fertility management in Togo.

Introduction

In the early 1980s, Tanzania's economy was deteriorating with dazzling speed. The economic decline revealed itself in many ways. Real GDP was decreasing, agricultural growth was less than population growth, the government faced high fiscal deficits, inflation rates were high and increasing, industrial output declined 15 percent annually and the country's transport system, and other public services (health, education, research, extension) were worsening tremendously (Mans, 1994). The origins of this crisis were external as well as internal. In the 1970s, Tanzania's economy was affected by quadrupling oil prices, severe droughts, the break-up of the East African Community and the war with Uganda under Idi Amin. After the Arusha Declaration in 1967, Tanzania followed a development strategy based on socialism, and government control on every aspect of life started to increase. The banking system was dominated by monopolized, inefficient state banks. Foreign exchange was controlled by the government and private holding of foreign currency was illegal.¹ Prices of 400 consumer goods were controlled by the government. Imports were restricted and import duty rates went up to 200 percent, with an additional sales tax of up to 300 percent (Mans, 1994). The food market was controlled and food subsidies were supplied to an overstuffed and underpaid civil service (Bryceson, 1987). The marketing of export crops was dominated by a large number of inefficient parastatals and by government controlled cooperative unions (Mans, 1994). Foreign donors doubted the willingness of the Tanzanian government to address the internal origins of the economic decline and reduced their aid sharply after 1981. This led to declining imports of (industrial) spare parts to the point at which they could no longer support the economy, and to declining imports of consumer goods, which caused widespread shortages (Mans, 1994).
