

RECOMMENDED BY THE BOOK SOCIETY

THE first part of Freya Stark's autobiography, Tamarle's Prelude, recounted her childhood and the struggles of her youth.

By the end of that volume she had broken free and was setting out on her first travels towards the East. This volume covers the period of her early travels. It recreates the excitement and the first impact of the Arabs and the Eastern world upon a sensitive, intelligent nature, endowed with insatiable curiosity and courage.

It covers her life in Baghdad, her journeys in Persia, the borders of the Caspian and Syria and her "treasure-hunt" in Luristan. Different as it is in background from the earlier volume, her power to reveal character not least of all her own, her "exquisite balance of humour and wisdom" and the vividness of the extracts from the letters written at the time, compare another "astounding performance in autobiography."

 See front flap for Press notices of Freya Stark's first volume of autobiography Tamarle's Prelude.

"Even in my poorest days, finance has had nothing to do either with the planning or the writing of my books: what they have brought was welcome, but they were written for their own sake, not here I ever debated whether this thing or the other might be what the public wants; when anyone makes suggestions of this sort, which they sometimes do, it grates upon me and I think of the Public as friends, who are to like me for myself alone and not as a Coterie to whom cakes must be given to make a good thing. If I had to work for my living altogether I could not be a writer but a cook—and would write for my own pleasure after the dinner was served."
