Introductory Outline of Georgia Prehistory

THIS brief, perhaps over-simplified, and certainly superficial summary of Georgia prehistory is provided for the non-archaeologist who will need a historical frame of reference for the cultural data in subsequent chapters.

For more detailed description and discussion of the culture periods in Georgia relative to other areas of the United States, one should consult such sources as A. R. Kelly (1938, 1954), Caldwell (1952, 1954, 1958), Fairbanks (1952, 1954), and Sears (1956, 1958), and consider them against general backgrounds provided by Ford and Willey (1941), J. B. Griffin (1952b), Jennings (1952), Cotter (1954), Ritchie (1955), Phillips, Ford, and J. B. Griffin (1951), Caldwell (1958), Lewis and Kneberg (1958, 1959), Haag (1961), Mason (1962), DeJarnette, Kurlack, and Cambron (1964), Dragoo (1963), Sears (1964), Phelps (1964), Cambron and Hulse (1964), Coe (1964), and other writers.

PALEO-INDIAN OR EARLY LITHIC

Paleo-Indian usually designates the early presumably nomadic hunting-gathering cultures in the New World, covering a period whose beginning is still uncertain and whose end came at widely varying dates among the different regions involved, but beginning about 8000 B.C. with the extinction of early forms of bison, the onset of the althithermal warm dry climate, or the rise of more sedentary peoples and, later, incipient cultivators. Many different peoples may have practiced distinct cultures during these times, although our grouping them all together under one name may give a contrary impression. Climate, habitat, game, hunting habits, and natural foods of this era surely changed through time and through space. Some Paleo-Indians, for example, seem to have favored the mammoth as part of their diet during certain periods, some preferred various forms of early bison, and some probably chose seeds and other natural foods. It is likely that a few, perhaps all, did not rely primarily on hunting at all but instead based their subsistence on wild plant foods. Nevertheless, a number of traits — mostly centering around the use of lanceolate projectile points and associated artifacts — persisted through time and space and suggest a certain cultural homogeneity over wide areas of the continent, leading Goggin (1949) to speak of a "basic consistent unit" and a "distinctiveness to the configuration" in the eastern United States while Cotter (1954) suggests a Paleo-Indian tradition for all of North America, with regional variations as suggested by Roberts (1953). Mason (1962: 229) writes: "Clearly, a single life-way is represented [in western North America], one homogeneous in its big-game hunting orientation, although the particular species hunted changed in time and space."

Mason's 1962 treatise, The Paleo-Indian Tradition in Eastern North America, limits the term "Paleo-Indian" to the cultures which utilized lanceolate points under the name Plano as known in the West and the eastern "point complexes, flake-tool, or blade industries," that are thought to be related to these types. Mason tentatively calls "Early Paleo-Indian" the fluted point assemblages, and "Late Paleo-Indian" the usually non-fluted lanceolate forms and associated artifacts (Mason 1962: 233). I have surely oversimplified an extremely complicated and as yet poorly understood archaeological situation in quoting Mason above (see Beyer 1962: 249–50; Krieger 1962: 257–59), but it will perhaps suffice to provide a general background for the one or two fluted points our survey found in Georgia.
