

Chapter Three

Theories and Approaches to the Study of International Relations

This chapter deals with the dominant theories from the two big schools: classical/traditional/grand/ vs. critical/radical/ theories in the study of international relations. These are classical/traditional/grand/ vs. critical/radical theories:

- ❖ Classical School of thought: Liberalism/Political Idealism and neo-liberalism/neo-idealism, Realism/neo-realism,
- ❖ Critical school of thought: comprised of Marxism, Structuralism and Feminism, and Post Structuralism/Constructivism

3.1. Classical Liberalism/Political Idealism

Level of analysis: Individual: moral principles of individuals may translate into that of nations. &/or form of government: democratic governments are preferred means for transferring those moral principles of individuals into those of the international system. Democratic governments exist as moral examples for other nations still struggling on the path to Enlightenment. Liberalism adds values into the equation. It is often called idealism. It is a state level theory which argues that there is a lot of cooperation in the world, not just rivalry. States don't just compete or worry about power. States try to build a more just world order. They often do so because they have learned that in many instances cooperation is a better strategy than conflict. States try to create enforceable international law. States are progressive forces for social justice. Liberalism might look at the cold war and examine the different values of the US and USSR and point out the repressive and murderous nature of the Soviet state as the key to the US and USSR animosity. It also might look at the decades-worth of US-USSR cooperation in the midst of the cold war (arms control, the lack of direct conflict).
