A Lear of the Steppes and Other Stories Ivan Sergeevich Turgenev, 2020-09-28 A Lear of the Steppes Ivan Sergeevich Turgenev, 2003-07-01 A Lear of the Steppes is a supreme example of Turgenev's imaginative interpretation of life and of his habit of representing the universal in a single episode. It is the tragedy of a powerful nature Harlov the Lear of the tragedy and the novelist's art is directed by showing how the tragic event affects the household and relatives of the sufferer and how the whole life of the community in which he lived is more or less influenced by his death A Lear of The Steppes, Etc. life which Turgenev gives us in A Lear of the Steppes is the highest demand we can make from art. Add the last story in the present volume though it gives us a sense of mystery, its end is faked to suit the artist's purpose and thus, in other ways, it is far inferior to Lear. Faust, the second story, has consummate charm in its strange atmosphere of the supernatural mingling with things earthly, but it is not as Lear is seen from the surface to the revealed depths; it is a revelation of the strange forces in life presented beautifully, but it is rather an idea, a problem to be worked out by certain characters than a piece of life inevitable and growing. When an artist creates in us the sense of inevitability, then his work is at its highest and is obeying nature's law of growth, unfolding from out itself as inevitably as a tree or a flower or a human being unfolds from out itself. Turgenev at his highest never quits nature; yet he always uses the surface and what is apparent to disclose her most secret principles, her deepest potentialities, her inmost.
