

How to Write Lab Notes and Lab Reports

Important Note:

Each instructor has a specific way they want students to record and maintain lab notes and summarize their lab activities. Your instructor may provide you with specific instructions regarding the formats you should use. The following information will familiarize you with how lab notes and lab reports are usually prepared in the real world of science and give you a better understanding of the scientific method. Elements of this document may be useful if your instructor requires you to write formal lab reports, as is often required in college courses.

Laboratory notes and reports are two basic records compiled during and after scientific experimentation. Laboratory notes are recorded as an experiment is performed. Entries in a laboratory notebook are the basis used to write laboratory reports. The lab report formally summarizes the activities and findings of an experiment and is often submitted to the instructor for grading.

Lab Notes

Scientists keep track of their experimental procedures and results as they work by recording laboratory notes in a journal-type notebook. These notes include observations of experiments and collected data points. In laboratories, the notes are often read by colleagues, such as directors and other scientists working on a project. In some cases, scientific notebooks have become evidence in court cases. Consequently, lab notes must be intelligible to others and include sufficient information so that the work can be replicated. There must be no doubt about the honesty and reliability of the data and the researcher.

Entries include all observations, actions, calculations, and conclusions related to each experiment. Data and notes should never be recorded on pieces of scratch paper; instead, data should be entered directly into the notebook while performing the experiment. When erroneous data are recorded, a light, diagonal line should be drawn through the error, and a brief explanation written as to why the data has been voided. Any information that is gained through experimental error should also be recorded. The knowledge gained through experimental error and mistakes is often valuable for future experimentation.

As in campus-based science laboratories, independent study students are usually expected to keep a complete scientific notebook of their work, which may or may not be periodically reviewed by the instructor. Notebooks appropriate for data recording are bound and have numbered pages that cannot be removed. For example, paperbound 5x7 notebooks of graph paper work well. Since it is not practical to send notebooks back and forth to instructors for each experiment, students usually prepare formal lab reports and submit them along with their regular assignments to the instructor.
