

MEDIA VIOLENCE, GUN CONTROL, AND PUBLIC POLICY

Diana M. Zuckerman, Ph.D.

Public concern with the national level of violence is discussed, and the complexity of the issue delineated. Research findings in two key areas of the topic, media violence and availability of firearms, are examined, as is their applicability to public policy efforts and recommendations for the prevention of violence. An approach that combines efforts to counteract media violence with those aimed at effective gun control is outlined in terms of bringing about changes in attitudes toward violence and firearm possession.

Of the more than 25,000 yearly murders in the U.S. (American Psychological Association [APA] Commission on Violence and Youth, 1993), approximately 13,000 involve handguns. A recent slight decrease in the number of murders and other violent crimes notwithstanding, levels in the U.S. remain unacceptably high. The fact that children and youth are extensively involved as both victims and perpetrators increases the pressure to understand why murders are increasingly the result of minor arguments and petty theft, and to reverse that trend.

policy makers has become increasingly involved ("Violence," 1993).

Thus far, however, solutions have been elusive, and the public's concern for the safety of our communities has grown. The data from these hundreds of studies clearly indicate an association between television viewing and aggressive behavior. In study after study, young children imitated specific violent behavior that they had just seen on television, and there is growing evidence that, even when such factors as social class are statistically controlled, children who watch violent television programs are more likely to be aggressive (Huston et al., 1992). Perhaps most persuasive, in the few existing longitudinal studies, children who
