

Which parts of the brain are highly stimulated when we fall in love?

VENTRAL TEGMENTAL AREA

Located in the midbrain, this area is part of the brain's reward system and the activity changes when we begin to fall in love. This part of the brain is stimulated by both natural rewards (e.g., food, sex) and drugs of abuse.

PREFRONTAL CORTEX

NUCLEUS ACCUMBENS

DOPAMINE

Twelve areas of the brain work together to release chemicals such as the "feel-good" hormone dopamine, the "cuddle hormone" oxytocin, and adrenaline, which induces a euphoric sense of purpose.

BASAL GANGLIA

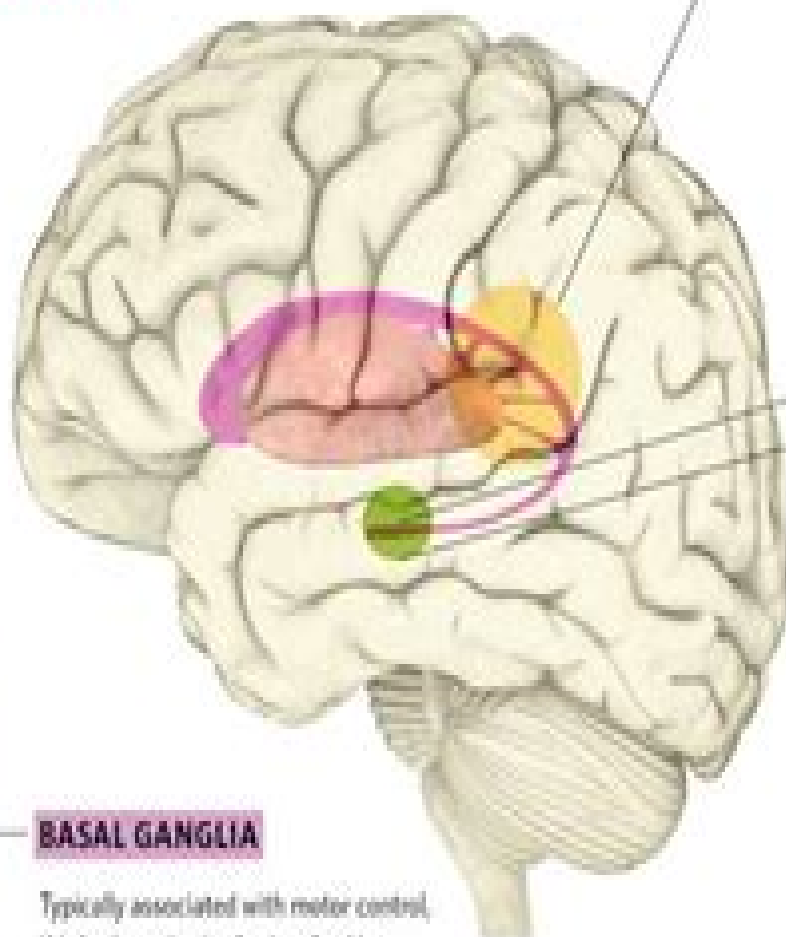

Typically associated with motor control, this brain region is also involved in promoting attachment, which gives humans and other mammals the ability to stick it out and stay together even when things aren't going so well.

ANGULAR GYRUS

The part of the brain associated with complex language functions and the mirror neuron system, this region helps you anticipate the actions of a loved one.

AMYGDALA HIPPOCAMPUS

Study findings indicate that the brain's reward circuit—the amygdala, the hippocampus, and the prefrontal cortex—which is very sensitive to behaviors that induce pleasure, lit up on brain scans when talking about a loved one because of increased blood flow in these areas.
