

First Perspectives of Personality

1. The concept of stability in individual differences of personality.
 - "When we are talking about stability, we are talking about the timeline."
 - Examples:
 - 400 meter dash. In the 1960's there were two fast runners. In 2012, all runners were relatively the same. The change is in the individuals.
 - Definition:
 - If the differences between individuals will change or not.
 - How is the stability measured and interpreted?
 - We use a correlation coefficient.
 - Example 1:

	T1	T2
Class average	53%	66%

Correlation between T1 & T2 $r=0.95$ (strong correlation)

How to interpret the stability of individual differences between T1 and T2?

Not many differences between test 1 and test 2.

- "If the correlation is weak, the individual differences were not stable between the two terms. If the correlation is strong, the individual remain strong between the two terms."
- When the same people were measured twice and the correlation was strong ($r=0.70$) between the two set of scores, it means the individual differences were stable between Time 1 and Time 2. In other words, the individual differences did not change much between Time 1 and Time 2. Still in other words, the individual rankings did not change much between Time 1 and Time 2. It is wrong to say "there were not many individual differences between Time 1 and Time 2".
- If the correlation is weak ($r=0.30$), it means the individual differences were not stable between Time 1 and Time 2. In other words, the individual differences changed a lot between Time 1 and Time 2. But it is wrong to say "there were a lot of individual differences between Time 1 and Time 2".

2) Two major formulations of traits:

- The personality traits are stable, internal causal properties of behaviour (deductive approach)
 - Example:
 - Not coming to class is laziness.
- Descriptive summary of behaviours (inductive approach)
 - Example:
