Part-I. Applying Ten Selected Principles in Educational Psychology in HPE

1. Student Engagement

Example: In a nursing program, students might participate in a simulated emergency room scenario. This hands-on activity engages them cognitively (thinking through medical procedures), affectively (feeling the urgency of the situation), and behaviourally (performing tasks).

Explanation: Student engagement involves cognitive, affective, behavioural, agentic, and socio-cultural dimensions.

Application: Use interactive lectures, case-based learning, and simulation exercises to enhance engagement.

Assessment: Monitor participation in discussions, practical sessions, and reflective journals.

2. Motivation

Example: A dental student might be motivated by the desire to open their own practice (intrinsic motivation) and by the need to pass board exams (extrinsic motivation). Educators can use both types of motivation by discussing career goals and providing practice exams.

Explanation: Motivation can be intrinsic (internal) or extrinsic (external).

Application: Provide clear goals, rewards, and real-world applications to maintain motivation.

Assessment: Use surveys to gauge student motivation levels and track performance improvements.
