

Analogy of Attribution

- There are three forms of analogy described by Aquinas: attribution, proper proportion, and improper proportion. The first of these (attribution) is dead easy.
- Aquinas thought that we could gain understanding of God by considering his role as creator. Simply, if God made the world then we could expect the world to reflect God in some way. So, we would be justified in drawing analogies between the world and God.
- Aquinas also explains this by the example of a bull and its urine. The health of the animal is present in its urine; we can tell that the bull is healthy by studying this. However, the health of the bull is only complete in the bull itself. So, what the urine tells us is indirect and incomplete. So too with God: what the world tells us of his goodness is meaningful, but it is also limited.
- That gives us the order of reference – God's goodness is foremost, because he is the source of this quality. The world has goodness only in a secondary respect.

The world contains a measure of goodness, being God's creation. So, this goodness is an analogy of God's goodness.
