Arboviruses in the Mediterranean countries

Edited by JELKA VESENIJAK-HIRJAN, J. S. PORTERFIELD and ERIKA ARSLANAGIĆ. 1980. 6th FEMS Symposium. Gustav Fischer Verlag, Stuttgart and New York. Pp. xv and 332.

In countries bordering the Mediterranean the only arbovirus that has caused a significant morbidity in recent years has been tick-borne encephalitis virus. Resources to study any other arbovirus activity have been very limited. The outbreak of Rift Valley Fever in Egypt in 1977 and 1978, involving 18 000 human cases and 600 deaths, suddenly alerted countries in the area to the dangers of possible spread, and this symposium was arranged to follow immediately the International Virology Congress in The Hague to bring together Mediterranean virologists and a wide spectrum of international experts.

The symposium was essentially in three parts, namely, papers from invited speakers, reports from delegates of 12 Mediterranean countries and poster demonstrations. The nine review papers by invited speakers are excellent. P. Bres outlines the WHO programme on arboviruses, N. Oker-Blom, C. H. Calisher, A. Oya and D. K. Lvov review the arbovirus activity in Europe, the Americas, East Asia and Russia, respectively, and there is a particularly valuable review of tick-borne viruses by Harry Hoogstraal. Gordon Smith discusses priorities in arbovirus research, J. S. Porterfield puts arboviruses in perspective, and D. H. L. Bishop discusses the genetic recombination potential of bunyaviruses.

The papers given by national delegates are perhaps not quite so interesting but they provide a review of current knowledge on arbovirus activity in 12 countries; France, Greece and Yugoslavia are particularly relevant from a European viewpoint. The poster demonstrations are often papers in themselves and cover a wide variety of topics which it is impossible to summarise.

This book is a very worthwhile account of arbovirus studies in countries surrounding the Mediterranean sea and should interest virologists, clinicians and medical entomologists.

Isolation and Identification of Ringworm Fungi

By D. W. R. MACKENZIE and C. M. PHILPOT. P.H.L.S. Monograph No. 15. 1981. H.M. Stationery Office. Pp. vi and 59. £3.50.

It is difficult to cover the essential aspects of any subject in a manner that will be clearly understood by those for whom it is little more than a fringe interest. It is so easy to confuse rather than inform. The authors of this booklet have managed to avoid this pitfall and are to be congratulated in producing a text that will be of considerable value to those who are called upon occasionally to confirm a diagnosis of ringworm by laboratory investigation.

There are four main sections covering respectively the general features of fungi, details of the parasitic phase of ringworm fungi, aspects of collection and processing of specimens and identification of isolates, and finally a detailed description of 18 common dermatophytes. In addition, there are two short but most useful background accounts on the classification and the ecology of dermatophytes. The many supporting illustrations are of a high standard and the association of line drawings with the relevant microphotographs is especially useful and commendable. The presentation and layout are generally excellent with perhaps only one unfortunate lapse—fig. 31 (M. persicolor) in the midst of the description of T. mentagrophytes. Criticisms are mostly of a relatively minor nature and may be considered as recommendations for possible adjustment in a future edition. The rather extensive (compared to that of other
