The armed forces and security apparatus are among the most important institutions of every Middle Eastern country. They have always played a crucial role in vital events both in their specific countries and the whole region. This fact was determined not only by the frequency of wars and military crises but mainly by the role of the military in domestic politics. In the past few decades, the army and in particular security apparatus presented a focal point of Arabian countries' politics. It was the center of the power and decision-making mechanism in Middle Eastern countries, while in the 1980-s Arab rulers managed to curb the appetites of their military for power and military coups. Further developments proved this tendency irreversible. Thus, the author's goal is to look at the region's armed forces both as the military establishment and the key social-political institution. The author also examines the interaction between politics and military, military and society and tries to show the main reasons behind the army's seizure of power in many Arab countries from the social, political, and economic backgrounds of military rule.

Keywords: army, security, Middle East, Arab Spring, Syrian Crisis, Syria, Egypt, Turkey, Lebanon, Saudi Arabia, Jordan, Islam, Secularism, Islamists
