

dream come true, he/she should be considered as a tragic hero as he/she has not become a personality, has not achieved humanity.

Dwelling upon the play Death of a Salesman by Arthur Miller and referencing the main character, Willy Loman, to the definition of a tragic hero, it should be concluded that he perfectly fits it.

Having a dream to help his children to become successful, Willy Loman does not pay attention to their desires and wants to reach his purpose, to make his sons wealthy salespeople. Children's desires do not coincide with the father's, and they fail to succeed. Father's dreams are ruined.

The only way out he sees is death. Living in two worlds, unreal, which he has imagined and where everything is perfect and real, where his dreams are failed, a man makes a decision.

He decides to help his family to be happy and dies, wishing to leave his family with money received as insurance after his death (Miller 'Death of a Salesman' 73).

The tragedy of the hero is that he could not become a good father, thinking only about his benefit and desires. Moreover, according to Arthur Miller, a common man can be a tragic hero (Miller 'Tragedy' 1461), and Willy Loman perfectly fits this characteristic feature.

Conclusion

In conclusion, considering the play Death of a Salesman by Arthur Miller, it should be mentioned that Willy Loman is a tragic hero who fails to become a personality. Having a desire to make his children successful, he forgets about his main purpose, to be a good father.

This is the main failure which leads the character to death, as he does not see another way out.
