Part III dealt with preferences of vocal performance style, and Part IV posed two questions regarding attitudes toward the performance of this repertoire by singers of all racial backgrounds (i.e., questions regarding perceptions of authenticity), in which the respondents were invited to explain their ratings with comments.

Approximately one-quarter of the respondents were African American and three-quarters Caucasian, and three-quarters of the respondents have at least one degree in music. Further, sixty percent of the respondents identified themselves as voice teachers and professional singers, and around thirty percent as voice students. More than sixty percent said that they had never received any instruction on singing African American art songs or spirituals in their private or institutional voice studio, but almost eighty-seven percent said they desired to perform this literature.

Following a poster presentation at the Sixth International Congress of Voice Teachers Conference (Vancouver, 2005), research survey findings
