

Chapter 3

Persistent Toxic Substances

The problems of persistent toxic substances (PTS) dominate three annexes of the Agreement: Annex 12 (Persistent Toxic Substances), Annex 14 (Contaminated Sediment), and Annex 15 (Airborne Toxic Substances). The primary response of the Parties to persistent toxic substances is the Great Lakes Binational Toxics Strategy, which is discussed in Section 3.4.

3.1 Annex 12 - Persistent Toxic Substances

Annex 12 addresses definitions, general principles, programs, monitoring, early warning system, human health, research, and reporting. This annex embraces the philosophy of zero discharge and the goal of virtual elimination, and the Parties have achieved considerable success in controlling direct, point source discharges of toxic chemicals to the lakes. The Commission finds, however, that there are two remaining significant challenges to the virtual elimination of persistent toxic substances. The first is the historic burden of toxic chemicals in contaminated sediment; the second is the ongoing problem of airborne pollutants. The Parties' Great Lakes Binational Toxics Strategy does not adequately address either of these two remaining challenges.

The Commission's assessment of progress under Annex 12 examines the threat to human health, the early warning system, new and previously unidentified chemicals, chemical mixtures, and the general principles of the annex.

Threat to Human Health

The Parties have made progress in identifying the problems related to persistent toxic substances, most of which have human health implications. This work includes an increased understanding of the neurological, developmental, and trans-generational effects of some persistent toxic substances.
