

MEDIA VIOLENCE, GUN CONTROL, AND PUBLIC POLICY

Diana M. Zuckerman, Ph.D.

Public concern with the national level of violence is discussed, and the complexity of the issue delineated. Research findings in two key areas of the topic, media violence and availability of firearms, are examined, as is their applicability to public policy efforts and recommendations for the prevention of violence. An approach that combines efforts to counteract media violence with those aimed at effective gun control is outlined in terms of bringing about changes in attitudes toward violence and firearm possession.

Of the more than 25,000 yearly murders in the U.S. (American Psychological Association [APA] Commission on Violence and Youth, 1993), approximately 13,000 involve handguns. In contrast, 128 handgun murders occur each year in Canada, 97 in Switzerland, and 60 in Japan (Handgun Control, 1995). For many years, law enforcement professionals and social scientists have sought solutions to the growing epidemic of violence in America. A recent slight decrease in the number of murders and other violent crimes notwithstanding, levels in the U.S. remain unacceptably high. The fact that children and youth are extensively involved as both victims and perpetrators increases the pressure to understand why murders are increasingly the result of minor arguments and petty theft, and to reverse that trend.

During the last decade, violence has increasingly been defined as a public health problem, as well as a social one; as a result, the work of health care professionals and policy makers has become increasingly involved ("Violence," 1993).

Thus far, however, solutions have been elusive, and the public's concern for the safety of our communities has grown. In response, the results of several decades of social science research have been translated into media sound bites in which policy makers have blamed media violence, video games, and rap music for teaching American youth that violence is an acceptable way to deal with life's problems. The data from these hundreds of studies clearly indicate an association between television viewing and aggressive behavior. In study after study, young children imitated specific violent behavior that they had just seen on television, and there is growing evidence that, even when such factors as social class are statistically controlled, children who watch violent television programs are more likely to be aggressive (Huston et al., 1992). Perhaps most persuasive, in the few existing longitudinal studies, children who

American Violence And Public Policy:

Crime, Communities, and Public Policy Chicago Assembly, 1995 Hardy management McGill U examines how Canadian university administrators responded to declining enrolment funding cutbacks and public demands for more accountability during the 1980s Citing six examples she argues that their efforts to centralize authority and reallocate resources have failed to account for the political realities of university life and conflict and recommends they take a broader view and seek consensus among competitors for scarce resources Canadian card order number C95 920993 X Annotation copyright by Book News Inc Portland OR
