

time 'phrase' (sentence). One could have expected 'énoncé' for Aussage, which is close to the English 'statement'. But the translators have preferred a cumbersome periphrastic 'ce qui est dit' (what is said). These excellent translations will be useful to English-speaking readers for comparison. They also show that Fregean scholarship has progressed in France, although it is surprising that here, and in most of the French books on Frege so far, there is no serious reference to Dummett's work. Light dawns very gradually over the whole.

PASCAL ENGEL

A Common Humanity: Thinking about Love and Truth and Justice, by Raymond Gaita. London: Routledge, 2000. Pp. 328. H/b £17.99.

Much recent work in philosophical normative ethics, including much of the best work, has been dominated by a certain kind of studied thinness and formality. Kantianism, contractarianism, act, rule and motive consequentialism, and other theories (sometimes even virtue ethics and particularism, which you might have thought would resist this sort of treatment) are defined abstractly as different practical algorithms, as bare outlines of theories of practical rationality, and then put into theoretical competition with each other. In this competition what counts as a good ethical theory is judged by pretty much the same criteria as those that settle what counts as a good scientific theory: logical coherence, ontological economy, simplicity, explanatory power, intuitiveness, resistance to disproof by counter-example, fit with other already-accepted theories. What emphatically does not count in any theory's favour in this competition is any kind of Depth or Uplift (as they may, with a certain sort of stern puritan dismissiveness, be called). Except as an optional and strictly non-functional extra, rhetoric, poetry, and appeals to the existential or ineffable are all out. In this style of ethics, what you can't show by plain and sober argument, you can't show.

You do not have to be a peddler of obscurantist wool or sentimental slop to have your doubts about whether normative ethics should be done, or can only be done, or can best be done, in quite this laboratory manner. Rai Gaita, for instance, feels precisely this worry: 'I am deeply resistant to the kind of ethical theorizing that presupposes at the very outset that it is contingent to our understanding of the values we call moral, of their authority and of how we critically assess their claims on us, that they occur in cultures rich in literary and artistic traditions ... the moral and rhetorical power of [the most powerful] ethical formulations depends on their impressive capacity to resonate in a natural language rich in association, steeped in a literary tradition and yielding a depth well beyond the resources of official theory, and to which, indeed,
