

A DRAGON APPARENT

Curiosity took Norman Lewis to Indo-China. Attracted by the accounts of early travellers and stimulated by the lack of anything like up-to-date information, he went to see for himself what remained of the glories of the past and form some estimate of what the future held for the peoples of this fabulous region. His book is timely, the information he gathered highly topical, and his personal experiences uncommonly interesting. Whether he is interviewing the King of Cambodia, investigating the various practices of the Cao-Dai sect, describing the primitive life, or observing the differences of opinion between the French military administration and the planners, he is always interesting and surprising, always—in fantastic jungle scenes or urban night-life—a sensitive recorder of impressions.

In his novels (Kamuro and Wishes for Labyrinth) Norman Lewis displayed his gift for describing strange people and strange places. The descriptive passages in the present book—for example, of his visit to Angkor Wat, or the 'love-courts' at Vientiane—are all the more remarkable because he subdues his own personality in favour of their objective reporting and interpreting the many extraordinary people, places and situations with which he found himself involved. Exposed to the hazards of travel—by air in ramshackle plane, by road in ramshackle bus, or in military conveyance through the jungle—he covered some thousands of miles, unaided by linguistic difficulties or exotic diet, and was able at last to realize his ambition of crossing the lines into Viet Minh territory. A talented writer, he is also an expert photographer. The photographs which illustrate his narrative are bright and beautiful.
