Books to read

- Bridge by Seymour Chwast
- Architecture for Dummies by Don Murray

Directions

1. Review components of a bridge with students.
2. Pass out supplies to each group of students.
3. Ask students to build a bridge that can hold a cup full of coins.

Exploration

Which type of bridges are students choosing to make? How are the groups problem solving and working together? After 10 minutes stop the groups and have them discuss the challenges of building the bridge. What is working? What is not working? Let the groups continue working for 20 minutes to update and adjust their bridges based on the data discussed. After the students are done with their bridges, ask the groups why they built the way they did and what type of bridge they built and how they built it.

Assessment and Evaluation

The different types of bridges support different weights across a single span. How building a bridge is like how to use them for long can be like the role of the bridge and how it supports a certain amount of weight? Bridges are designed to withstand forces pulling down upon them, like the weight of the cars. The bridge must be able to move and compress. Stress is the result of opposing forces acting against it. Compression is the force that pushes and weighs the rest of the structure on bridges.

Which of the student bridges best support the weight and compression? How students used to solve the compression and tension on their own bridges?

Force, stress, and tension are used for the force of tension and compression by spreading them out the bridge evenly.

Can students draw where they have built tension, stress, and used support cables to support their bridge?
