

AIDS and sexual behaviour in France

ACSF investigators*

The results of a massive telephone survey of sexual lifestyles in France should provide a basis for prevention strategies for AIDS and sexually transmitted diseases.

With sexual transmission of the human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) now known to be widespread in northern Europe and North America¹, many countries in these areas have decided to undertake surveys of sexual behaviour in the general population. The aim of these studies is to achieve better-defined strategies for preventing sexually transmitted diseases (STDs) and AIDS, as well as to provide the basis for more accurate models to determine the development of the epidemic². Some preliminary studies have already been conducted in countries such as Norway³, Denmark⁴ and Scotland⁵. Although the study of sexual behaviour has been amply legitimized by the context of AIDS, this legitimacy cannot unfortunately be taken for granted everywhere^{6,7}.

In France, a survey on sexual behaviour in a representative sample of the general population was carried out in 1970 arising from the increasing use of medical contraception⁸. In response to the spread of the AIDS epidemic, the French government asked the Agence Nationale de Recherches sur le Sida (ANRS) to perform a survey of sexual behaviour and AIDS in the general population (called ACSF for Analyse des Comportements Sexuels en France). To our knowledge, this study is the most comprehensive of its kind. It has been constructed in a way that can provide a basis for comparisons with other countries, particularly with the British study, which deals with a similar sample in a comparable country⁹.

Our work began in July 1989. Three pilot surveys were carried out in the first 2 years to test the questionnaire, decide on the method of investigation (telephone or face-to-face) and to see if sending out a notifying letter affected whether people would participate in the study. The results prompted us to choose the telephone method for the national survey, with a notifying letter being sent beforehand^{9,10}. The population base was assembled from a list of all the telephone numbers in France (94% of French households have a telephone). A total of 110 interviewers took part in the survey from September 1991 to February 1992, following a 2-day training period. Each telephone number was tried for up to 12 times.

The first part of the questionnaire, which lasted 15 minutes, was designed to measure the prevalence of a number of risk indicators: homosexual/bisexual intercourse; intercourse with prostitutes over the past 5 years; multiple partners; and drug consumption in the past year. This part of the survey was applied to everyone questioned: a total of 20,055 people aged 18–69 years. An additional questionnaire lasting around 30 minutes was administered to all people replying to the first questionnaire who reported one of the above risk indicators ($n = 2,271$), and to a control group of people selected at random by their date of birth ($n = 2,549$)¹¹. The longer questionnaire included a sexual biography and details of several psychological and social characteristics.

Acceptability and reliability

Considerable efforts were made to maximize the response rate of the survey and to obtain the most reliable information possible. To convince the interviewees that their answers would remain anonymous, a letter explaining this policy was sent to all the selected households beforehand. All identifying information (name, address, telephone number) was automatically destroyed as soon as the reply to the first question was entered into the computer system.

Once selected, a household was informed that the aim of the survey was to make prevention of disease more effective, and that the survey was being conducted by researchers employed by public-health institutions. The theme of AIDS and sexual behaviour was deliberately not mentioned in the letter to avoid worrying people, to prevent refusals before selection of the interviewee and to prevent people from preparing answers in advance. (The results of our pilot survey indicated that this strategy would be sensible.) Once the eligible person had been randomly selected from within the household, he or she was informed that the questionnaire concerned AIDS prevention and included questions on sexual behaviour. Given that AIDS can be sexually transmitted, the questions referring directly to the disease were placed after questions on sexual behaviour to minimize the possibility of people inaccurately claiming 'socially desirable' behaviour, such as condom use.

A random sample was used, first to ensure compatibility with surveys in other countries, and second because quota sampling leaves a broad freedom of choice in which subjects are interviewed, and generally leads to higher reported proportions of multipartner or homosexual individuals¹². To minimize recall problems, it was decided to focus on a detailed description of sexual practices and means of protection used in the last two sexual encounters that may have taken place in the year preceding the study¹³. This policy is identical to that adopted in the Norwegian survey³. A linguistic analysis of 100 telephone interviews during the pilot study allowed us to adjust the wording of the questionnaire so that the language used would be as clear and neutral as possible, without using words that were considered either too technical or over-vernacular¹⁴.

A total of 40,000 telephone numbers were drawn at random from all the telephone numbers in France, of which 30,157 were potentially eligible. The refusal rate for the households contacted was 11.8%. Subsequently, 11.6% of selected individuals refused to participate. Only 7% of these refusals were prompted by a reluctance to answer questions on sexual behaviour.

If households where no one could be contacted are not taken into account (that is, if we assume that these people would have refused at the same rate as those who were contacted), the refusal rate was 23.5%, very close to the rate
