This study investigates the impact of trade facilitation through costs, documents, and time to import and export—on agricultural sector performance (ASP) for a panel of 33 Sub-Saharan African (SSA) countries from 2005 to 2019. The empirical analysis is based on a dynamic system of generalized method of moments. The following findings are established. First, higher import costs, documents, and time significantly improve ASP, while exports negatively impact ASP. Second, while import costs promote trade in agricultural products through substitution effects, export costs impede it. Third, among other factors, improvements in human capital, gross fixed capital formation, population growth, and trade openness significantly improve agricultural sector performance. Fourth, the results of the robustness check further emphasize the importance of TF on ASP from various dimensions. The study concludes that improving TF procedures by reducing costs, documents, and time in cross-border trade remains crucial to boosting agriculture sector performance in SSA.

1 INTRODUCTION

It is now widely known in the literature that trade significantly drives economic growth and development (Ahmed et al., 2022; Kobo et al., 2017). The effects of international trade on economic growth have gained much attention and have equally stimulated an increasing body of literature since the works of Grossman and Krueger (1991). Notably, most scholars have pointed out that countries that are open to trade and accompanied by tariff reduction and removal of institutional barriers are more likely to perform better than countries that do otherwise (Zahonogo, 2016). The performance metric is not restricted to economic growth only but also cuts across issues relating to poverty alleviation, price stability, and reduction in unemployment (Figueiredo, & Lima, 2022; Sakyi et al., 2017). Consequently, developing economies have resorted to trading policies as tools that can spur development objectives such as creating employment and alleviating poverty (Ratna and Ferracane, 2013; Ngosho and Nchofoing, 2021; Kim and Lin, 2022). The renewed interest in trade-led growth has been accompanied by a tremendous increase in trade volume globally. Today, approximately one-fourth of total global production is exported (Esteban et al., 2018).
