Allergy, Toxins and the Learning-Disabled Child

In 1965 we recruited a vivacious young woman as a technician in our neurophysiology and behavior modification lab. Although she had no college training she had been on the staff of the marine biology lab of a major university as a mass spectrometrists and micropaleontologist. She was a very intelligent, popular, outgoing, well organized and competent person capable of an enormous amount of skilled work.

Several months after joining us Mrs. Black became very irritable. She began to have serious marital problems. She became less competent at work. From having been the center of social activity, her office became a solitary cell. She began to choose very dark, often black clothing. She painted her bedroom dead black (enough of a reason for marital conflict). She painted her office dead black.

I began to think of Mrs. Black in psychodynamic terms. "She cannot accept the pressure of responsibility in a novel community that does not use time clocks and other management devices." "She cannot adapt to the importance of her husband's role in our program." "She has always controlled the society around her; and her habitual methods don't work in this therapeutic environment; therefore she is attempting to control by being sick."

Mrs. Black became increasingly fatigued, tense, antisocial, and incompetent. (She had spells when she could not type, and temporary periods when she could not read.) My response was exasperation -- after all, I knew she had greater capacity than she was presently demonstrating; and this childish retreat was not worthy of such a gifted person.

It occurred that a hemophiliac student had a crisis and blood was needed. A number of staff went down to give blood. The nurses could not measure any blood pressure on Mrs.
