

Asian-American Community and Cultural Diversity

 Exclusively available on IvyPanda

Summary

Asian Americans usually face challenges in maintaining and building a new cultural identity. First of all, this problem concerns second-generation immigrants, those who were already born in the US. They are more assimilated into society than their parents, and at the same time, they try to preserve the traditional ideas of their native culture. Typically, Asian families are dominated by a clear structure and hierarchy, which softens among immigrants. However, within the family, children are taught that the well-being and integrity of the family are important, and they should not dishonor their family either. The leading Asian philosophies speak of the basic principles of life, including peace, balance, and harmony. As a result, most Asians seem more non-confrontational and even passive to other cultures.

Therefore, Asians who break out of traditional values more than others are called Americans. In the example I have given, it is clear that the older generation, although it does not oppose merging into a new culture, is still more burdensome to observe traditions. At the same time, their children, who are already considered the 'more American' generation because they were born and raised in America, are assimilated more than their relatives. I showed the example of Rongyan and her daughter so that people understand how the cultural identity of those who arrived in America at an already conscious age, and those who were born and raised in the USA, is built.

I have read an article on the subject, American Asians & Asian Diversity Cultural Information, and it fully confirms and explains my example. Chinese New Year, like many other holidays, such as the Mid-Autumn Festival, which Rongyan's daughter loves as much as Halloween. Their family celebrates Christmas, showing readers that immigrant families honor and value their traditions and the traditions of the country where they now live.
