

Psychological Assessments of Children

Common Components of Assessments

Psychological assessment of children is used to help clinicians, educators, and families have a better understanding of behavior and cognition, as they relate to overall development. Using a combination of approaches and assessment methods, psychologists attempt to understand not only a child's overall level of functioning, but also any meaningful pattern of strengths and weaknesses of their skills that may help with plans for interventions. That information and perspective may assist in planning for the child's medical, social and educational needs. Psychological assessment in particular, may be helpful by offering any or all of the following:

- Delineation of baseline functioning in one or more areas of concern
- Quantification and qualitative description of disturbances to some area of functioning
- Assistance in diagnosing relevant syndromes (e.g., Autism, ADHD)
- Monitoring changes in skills or functioning over time
- Monitoring the progression of an illness or disease process
- Tracking recovery from an illness or injury
- Development of intervention programs, based on current assessment functioning
- Description of the cognitive, emotional, and behavioral processes that will impact the child's functioning in school, work, and social situations
- Recommendations about a child's need for supervision or other environmental accommodation
- Guidance to parents and guardians on life decisions (e.g., school placement)
