

already known in terms of documentation and facts but, more to the point, the whole book is marred by an inappropriate, crude and dogmatic, application of Marxism on the part of the author, replete with quotes from Stalin. Not only are class forces pictured as operating directly in Ethiopian society – something they do not do even in developed capitalist states – but Schwab goes out of his way to heap on Mengistu the kind of uncritical prose normally associated with fellow travellers of the 1930s. His endorsement of the use of terror by the Derg as in some ways 'cleansing' is particularly distasteful.

Several particular areas of the book are treated in a careless manner. The discussion on the nationalities, particularly Eritrea, concedes far too much to the official Ethiopian position, a continuation under revolutionary guise of Haile Selassie's policies. One does not have to believe Eritrean independence to be practical, or even desirable, to see that the Derg have consistently antagonised that province's population. The discussion on the economy has been overtaken by the famine and the evident failure of the Derg to produce policies appropriate to the impoverished mass of the population. Peter Schwab may have a callously rosy picture of the Ethiopian evolution, but then he is far away.

FRED HALLIDAY

London School of Economics and Political Science

ELLEN IRENE DIGGS, Black Chronology: from 4000 BC to the abolition of the slave trade. Boston, Mass.: G. K. Hall, 1983, xii + 312 pp.

Today a generation has gone by since the first conference on African history took place in London. It established a Journal of African History and paved the way for a multi-volume Cambridge History of Africa. Shortly in every African university African history was established as a subject of serious study, and in many other countries besides, not least in USA. There, the annual conference of the African Studies Association has been attended by as many as 4000 persons at a time. In Africa in every school the history of Africans is taught. In every academic library of any serious repute monographs and journals on African history jostle on the shelves. Such is the change wrought by many devoted hands since your reviewer first set foot in the then Tanganyika in 1951 and opened the morning paper and read: 'Tanganyika has no history . . .'. Since then, indeed, many men and women have been up and doing, and more than thirty African nations play a dignified role in world affairs in the United Nations Assembly and elsewhere. Yet Dr Diggs asserts: 'there is so widespread a belief that Africa and Africans have no history'. If there is the smallest truth in this statement, her work will do nothing to cure it.

Dr Diggs' work is 'chronological from 4777 BC, when the first of three successive Egyptian empires began, to 1888, when all the slaves of Brazil were emancipated'. W. E. Burghardt Du Bois (1915) seems to be the authority for the first date, long superseded by later scholars, who prefer c. 3100 BC. And as to three successive empires, almost all scholars follow the Egyptian Manetho in counting more than twenty dynasties. (And were the Egyptians really black? Their own art of dynastic times shows them mostly as a reddish brown.) The next 100 pages or so give snippets of disconnected information up to the mid-eighteenth century: the great Bantu migration, the largest of all human migratory movements in Africa, receives no mention; indeed, the word 'Bantu' is absent from the index. From roughly p. 100 the remaining 200 pages are dominated by the names of works written by 'blacks' or about 'blacks' and the abolition of slavery up to 1888. Your reviewer does not know why the abolition of slavery in Brazil is a fatidic date: it is as if the Brussels Conference of 1889 were of no significance, nor that struggle that has continued long after, in Ethiopia and in Arabia. Not less does it ignore the continued struggle for human rights in the United States itself, the struggle of Martin Luther King, and the emergence of an Afro-American candidate for the American presidency.
