Angels

Summer 1961

I believe in angels. Black angels. If I come across white angels in a book at the public library, I take out my burnt amber Crayola and cover them in their true skin. I colour them all shades of deep brown and black, but my favourite is midnight black. A black so black it is almost blue, like the tar Mama paints on trees in the backyard after a spring storm to stop the open places from bleeding.

I believe in angels because I've seen them. They first appeared to me last month just before school ended. Leaning out the upstairs bathroom window brushing my teeth, I looked down on their heads. Three naked black girls with creamy white wings, throwing stones on my hopscotch board. They had long plaited hair that reached to their bottoms. They carried translucent disks that looked like halos under
