

became that much less African and more European' (p. 19-20). But perhaps most disconcerting are the inaccuracies in the text. The reviewer has conducted research into the people of Songea district, and is at variance with the author on most references made to these people. For instance, Mr Heussler refers to the elevation to power of a 'useless chief' (p. 46), when this man was probably the most powerful individual in Songea from 1918 till 1941. Again, he notes that one leader merited praise for not being traditional (p. 58), although many of his subjects considered his rule to be a continuation of nineteenth-century Ngoni imperialism. In a third instance, he mentions the removal of the classic bad weed of a DO because he had condoned torture. This DO had been the object of an inquiry some months before the 'torture' case because of serious discontent in the district arising from his administration. The abolition of his imposed internal boundaries—a move lamented by subsequent DOs—and the reduction in numbers of taxpayers—a step reluctantly undertaken by government after his departure—support the contention that peaceful administration, rather than humanitarianism, was the reason for his removal. In any case, systematic torture is not integral to the Ngoni judicial system (pp. 38-9). A cursory glance at data on other areas and peoples reinforces doubts about the general accuracy of the text. For instance, the federation in Sukumaland seems not to have had as traditional a basis as he implies (p. 52). Moreover TANU started in 1954 and not 1955. In the end, one becomes very wary of referring to any of the 'facts' in the text.

Not much need be said about the second section. The five reports present DOs' accounts of various aspects of life and work in their areas. Their quality is above average, as the reviewer can confirm from having pored through considerable archival data. But need they have been included in the text at all? The reader cannot deduce much from them. For how is he to know that they are accurate, or that they are not the insights of some of the better-informed and atypical officials? The book might have been more valuable had the author spent more time on his analysis, and merely added a paragraph or two stating that some DOs wrote lucid and penetrating reports.

One final note. Anyone using archival materials from the Tanzania National Archives has no justification for presenting references so inadequately when concise, numbered references are readily available.

In conclusion, a study of British administration can be a very worthwhile and productive endeavour, but presenting it requires a more objective approach than that in the present work.
